A FORK ON THE ROAD

Spanish restaurant, market, bakery and deli — all in one

BY LINDA BLASHEM

You'll feel like you're in a Spanish market at Artes de España (Breeze of Spain). On one side, there's a restaurant, with a decorative wrought iron archway and scrolled iron wall panels hung with ceramic plates glazed with cathedrals, windmills and Don Quijote chariatures.

On the other side there is a market. In between are deli cases filled with guipure cerve, prepared salada and olive oil and vinegar marinated olives, loquenes (white anchovies), octopus, artichoke hearts and toasted red pepper strips. Whole cured Serano ham legs dangle above the cases. Another holds cabra, mousses, flan cheesecake, rice pudding and fruit tarts.

There's fresh baked pan con chorizo with bits of spicy sausage and the house campitos, a crusty country loaf.

Wynwood West?

Three new craft-beer breweries are opening in western Miami-Dade

An upcoming brew pub is visible from the Palmetto Expressway

Doral will have three neighboring breweries to sample craft beer.

An orange Abraham Lincoln riding an old-timey bicycle peaks over rush-hour traffic on Bird Road and catches your eye from the rear side of the Palmetto Expressway with one bold, mouth-watering word against the back building of the brewery.

Just down the street to the bird road, there is a coming generation of craft brewers through their T-shirts amid wet paint and polystyrene vapors wafting through the open doors as they put the finishing touches on their shared dream.

"Miami's neighborhood brew pub. That's what we want to be," said head brewer John Falco, one of six owners — most of them ex-military at Doral's U.S. Southern Command — who are betting on beer. "This is my dream."

Like Lincoln's beard, whose orange and yellow logo is nearly visible above western Miami-Dade, lovers of craft beer — the brewer for artisanal beer brewed locally in small batches and moving west to chase that dream.

Three new breweries will come online west of Miami International Airport: a southside brewpub for the community where more Miamians are moving. They will join two in Doral, the third fastest growing U.S. city, firmly established MIA Beer Company and Bischoff Bay Brewing, whose long-awaited tasting room where beers can be sampled as you would in a bar is set to open in east Doral in early May.

"The market is ready, and it's growing," said Joe Malice, founder of Bischoff Bay, which has been brewing and distributing beer in Miami-Dade and Broward counties since setting up in Doral in September 2014.

Until now, Wynwood, where there are three brewpubs within a mile of one another, has been the place to be for beer. But as real-estate prices soar past $50 and $60 a square foot in that area, those interested in brewing in large, industrial spaces are looking to Doral, western Miami and Kendall, where rents can be as low as $40 to $62 a square foot.

Even Wynwood's best-known breweries are looking to set up full-scale breweries outside of their neighborhood as they are squeezed by rents and space.

LINCOLN'S BEARD BREWING

Who they are: Six partners, most ex-military and Department of Defense contractors who met at Doral's U.S. Southern Command, went in equally to help brewhouse John Falco's beers to the masses. "We don't just love the beer because he's our buddy. It's some of the best beer I've ever had," partner Scott Duarte said.

What's on tap: Falco will offer four flagship beers and rotate a host of varieties. Four staples will be Hunchurk Skillet, an American wheat ale with sweet orange peel; Avenge Me, an easy-drinking Irish red ale; F. Sunshine India Pale Ale with floral hops; Whig King imperial stout, at a strong 9 percent alcohol by volume.

Why it's special: Since they are not going to distribute. Lincoln's Beard can experiment with brewing many varieties and styles of beer, from fruity Belgians to dark, rich stouts and even whiskey-barrel-aged beers they can offer only at the brewery.

THE TANK BREWING

Who they are: Carlos Padron, a University of Miami lawyer who handles the Pastasciutta Group cigar empire, teamed up with Matt Weintraub, who helped establish a state-of-the-art brewing program at Florida International University. Weintraub brews true-to-style beers that have made him one of the most respected young brewers in Miami.

What's on tap: Tank will start with three flagship beers: La Finca Miami, a Belgian wheat saison with fruity notes and a clean dry finish; Freedom Tower Amber, a malty amber ale with clear caramel and toffee flavors; Tank IPA, their take on a floral, pleasantly bitter India Pale Ale.

Why it's special: When The Tank taproom opens this summer, they will be the first in Miami to offer a cigar bar, redone in cedar and leather chairs.

SPANISH MARIE BREWING

Who they are: Albert Cepedes enlisted two longtime Miami friends, including Jaime Medina, who cut his teeth as an assistant brewer at Coral Gables' Titanic Brewery. Their goal is to make their beer available in local bars and restaurants first before opening a tasting room in the fall.

What's on tap: Spanish Marie isn't afraid of bringing big, different flavors. The beers they put on the menu were the fruity and fragrant King Charles' passion-fruit Hefeweizen, made with locally grown de-passion fruit; 1929 Coffee Porter; and J'Nought American pale ale, a citrusy beer.

Why it's special: Spanish Marie will pair many of its beers at the brewery, with a host of confections, chocolates and candies on-site. The taproom will have a speakeasy vibe harkening back to the Prohibition-era drinking rooms.

If You Go

Three new breweries are set to open west of the Miami International Airport this year. A closer look at each one:

constraints.

Lake Worth Brewing is looking to build a brewery for production only that would make it the largest producer of Tampa's Cigar City Brewing and twice as big as Oakland Park's Funky Buddha Brewery — capable of brewing a massive 45,000-50,000 barrels of beer a year, founder Johnathan Waskie said.

And Wynwood's burgeoning brewery, Wynwood Brewing, is looking to be brewing in a large-scale brewery by the end of next year. Their breweries in Wynwood will be more like stonefronts where they can experiment with smaller batches of beer.

From Wynwood to the west, the golden beer rush is clearly well under way. Each brewery has its own style and character, most with a tasting room that acts as a lounge. Food is often available through food trucks or, increasingly, in-house kitchens.

Dropped right between Miami Springs and Doral, The Tank Brewery's beers will be available in local restaurants and bars in less than two weeks, said founder Carlos Padron, 50, whose day job of handling operations for the Pastasciutta Group's cigar import and sales department perfectly with his new endeavor.

The Tank's tasting room, which is still a study in concrete dust and outlines of future bars on Miami Dairy Road just south of Southwest 56th Street, will have a cigar bar inside when it opens this summer.

Wedged between warehouses, The Tank and other breweries work to make their tasting rooms destinations.

Padron stole away head brewer Matthew Weintou-trach, 27, from Florida International University, where he was an adjunct professor in the hospitality school, teaching beer-making at the school's state-of-the-art brew lab. Soon, they'll be able to make more than 9,500 gallons of beer a month at the Tank.

"I just want people to enjoy the beer," said Weintouch, whose first offering will be a saison, a so-called farmhouse-style style with a floral aroma and crisp finish like brut champagne.

Whereas some might see competition, local brewery owners have seen that more craft breweries helps educate non-beer drinkers and those who only know the mass-market, pale, yellow beers such as Budweiser, Heineken and Miller.

"We welcome it with open arms," said MIA Beer founder Eddie Leon, whose taproom fills up nightly for happy hour with locals.

"The two breweries are going to make the same beer, and each taproom provides a different experience. We do all something unique."

Across from the Tamiami Airport in Kendall, Alberto Cepedes teamed up with two longtime friends, including Jaime Medina, an assistant brewer at Miami's long-running Titanic Brewery in Coral Gables, to build Spanish Marie Brewing. The company expects to begin distributing its beers in July.

Spanish Marie, whose tasting room is expected to open in the fall, will have the feel of a hidden speakeasy, Cepedes said. He said he hopes it will be a local watering hole for Kendall residents who don't want to travel to Wynwood or even Doral for quality, locally made beer.

"We want to cater to people who don't want to drive as much as when they want to get a beer," he said.

Lincoln's Beard will brew only for its patrons in-house at its brewery under the bright orange sign visible from Bird Road. Proprietors envision a relaxed bar environment, with live music in the beer garden out back where locals can duck out of rush hour into happy hour. Kendall's Tacos & Tattos Mexican restaurant will have a permanent outpost at the brewery.

Florida craft breweries produce more than 35 million gallons of beer a year, according to the Brewers Association — enough to fill Leica's tank at the Seagull 70 times.

And now, craft-beer drinkers will have more options available in their own Miami neighborhoods. "We want to integrate fully into the community," Falco said.
